County: Revenue up, spending down

Manager rates current budget a 6 1/2 out of possible 10

By Robert Boyer

Amid a troubling economy and waning revenue, there is some good news to be found two-thirds into Alamance County's current budget year. Despite a 24.3 percent drop in sales tax revenue through the first eight months of the county budget, overall revenues are higher than anticipated, and spending is running below projections, says County Manager Craig Honeycutt. "With the year now 66 percent over, we are at 73 percent of revenue projections," Honeycutt said in

Loan for renovations nearly done

The county is scheduled today to close on a $5.9 million loan with RBC bank to help pay for the lion's share of its $9.4 million plan to refurbish county properties. Among other things, the financing deal with RBC bank will pay for more than $3 million in renovations to the old courthouse in Graham as part of a slew of second-phase "Group B" renovations that are part of the countywide Facilities Improvement Plan. The loan will use $3 million of federal Recovery Zone Economic Development Bond funding, which

Cancellation of inmate labor program leaves void

Flea market calls for volunteers to make up worker shortage

What do Elon's Beth Schmidt Park, the Alamance-Caswell Hospice Flea Market and canoe access points on the Haw River have in common? Prison inmates have worked on all of them. From the mid-1990s through 2009, work crews made up of minimum security inmates from the state's prison system worked on projects all over North Carolina. The crews did landscaping, made repairs, painted, created trails and worked on streets. The program ended in August 2009 because of the state's budget crisis. Using the inmates, the state had provided the labor for free to local governments, school systems and nonprofits. Each crew was supervised by an officer, N.C. Department of Correction spokesman Keith Acree said. There were more than 100 crews in North Carolina, so state legislators were able to reduce expenses by eliminating those positions when looking for budget cuts last year. The Dan River Prison Work Farm in Yanceyville had the largest number of inmate work crews of any prison in the state. Fifteen teams of eight men each worked on projects in nine counties. George Solomon, the prison work farm's administrator, said the crews often worked in Alamance County. Michael Fulcher, who supervised the work crew program at Dan River, said inmates would come to Burlington to install the canvas cover that turns the city's swimming pool into an indoor pool during the colder months. Acree said there's been discussion among legislators about renewing the program, though he thinks the state's continued budget problems make that unlikely this year.

Board may resolve Guilford border

Dispute over Orange County line proving more complex

By Robert Boyer
Times-News
rboyer@thetimesnews.com

It appears that at least half of Alamance County's double-barreled border dispute is on its way to a resolution. The Guilford County Board of Commissioners plans to consider, at a meeting today, approving a resolution recognizing the N.C. Geodetic 2008 Survey's survey of the Alamance-Guilford line and a second resolution asking the General Assembly to pass a proposed local bill regarding any changes stemming from the re-establishment of the historic line. Among other things, the proposed Guilford County resolution to the General Assembly recognizes the 2008 survey of the "1849 Guilford/Alamance boundary as the true historical line, together with such enabling legislation intended to correct any jurisdictional discrepancies and to ensure that any adverse impacts to the affected landowners are minimized and that no essential services to the property are adversely impacted." The draft also states that Guilford and Alamance counties will list and tax property only within their boundaries, and that officials from both counties will work together to minimize any adverse impacts to services or landowners.

State prison numbers drop for first time since 1972

Rhode Island, Michigan report largest decline

By David Crary
The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Spurred by budget crises, California and Michigan together reduced their prison populations by more than 7,500 last year, contributing to what a new report says is the first nationwide decline in the number of state inmates since 1972. The overall drop was slight, according to the Pew Center on the States — just 0.4 percent — but its report suggests there could be a sustained downward trend because of keen interest by state policymakers in curtailing corrections costs. "The political and policy environment has changed drastically," said Adam Gelb, director of the Pew Center's Public Safety Performance Project. According to official state data collected by the Pew Center, 1,403,091 people were under the jurisdiction of state prison authorities on Jan. 1, down by 5,739 from a year earlier. The report, being released Wednesday, said this was the first year-to-year drop in the state prison population since 1972, when there were about 174,000 prisoners. Since then, the nationwide prison population has soared, in part because of stiff sentencing laws, giving the U.S. the world's highest incarceration rate. With more inmates to handle, state corrections costs quadrupled over the past 20 years, according to the report. Many states are now in fiscal disarray, and legislators are looking afresh at ways to curb prison spending, but the Pew survey revealed a wide variation of responses. In 23 states, the number of prisoners increased in 2009 — notably in

COUNTDOWN TO DAY 3 SPRING

As one of the worst winters in recent memory winds down, we're itching for the first day of spring on March 20. As the big day approaches, we're counting down with a few things we're looking forward to.

A GREENER WORLD

Maybe the reason we like snow, at least the first couple of times it falls, is that it provides bright brilliant color in an otherwise grey world. The first morning after a snowfall, the sun shining on the sheet of white reminds us of the bright colors that Mother Nature has to offer. After a couple of days, of course, the snow is dirty and dingy, like everything else during the winter. The sky is gray. The grass is brown and dead. What was once the color of life and will be again is the color of death for a few months. Spring is like going from a black and white film to glorious Technicolor, as if the world has taken a happy pill right before our eyes. There's a lot of talk these days about "green power." That term makes us think not of wind turbines but the stirring in our soul when our world comes back to life. The green of spring gives us power to live.
