WEATHER REPORT

It's looking like a stormy Monday. Will Tuesday be just as bad?

PULL!

Ten teams discover just how heavy a school bus really is

One by one, teams of six grabbed hold of ropes and pulled.

The Boys & Girls Club bus, weighing in at about 30,000 pounds, only had to move 25 feet. The object of the game was all about what team could pull it the fastest.

Ten teams tried on Sunday in the parking lot behind the Burlington Municipal Building as part of a bus-pull fundraiser planned by an event management class at Elon University. The point of the fundraiser in the service-learning class taught by Elon professor Hal Walker was twofold: Students were challenged to raise money for a worthy cause and also to plan an event from beginning to end.

In this case, the money raised will be split between the Salvation Army's Boys & Girls Club of Burlington as well as the Multiple Sclerosis Society.

Elon University senior Kyle Johnson was the brains behind the idea. He developed it after an event he attended for N.C. Special Olympics that involves pulling an airplane at Raleigh-Durham International Airport.

"We just substituted a bus for a plane," he said.

The 14 students who worked on the event split into committees. One group targeted sponsors. Another planned the logistics, and the third marketed the fundraiser.

Amanda Portoghesi, a junior at Elon University who is majoring in leisure and sports management, said getting the experience was invaluable. She went out looking for sponsors and even had to get the event approved by the Burlington City Council.

"I like seeing the end process of everyone actually doing what we planned," she said. "Before now, it was just an idea we had back in February. ... It's a great hands-on experience. We had to think of literally every aspect of it."

For the Boys & Girls Club, it meant participating in a different kind of fundraiser — one that hasn't been done in Alamance County before, said Sherry Henderson, the director of the Boys & Girls Club.

It also meant continuing a relationship with Elon University students and receiving more funding to provide after-school services to children in the community.

"I would have to say that Elon is one of our biggest assets in Alamance County," Henderson said. "We have had 120 volunteers from Elon just this year that have come to assist in our programs. ... Our programs wouldn't be a success without them, so we are lucky to have them."

As for the teams that pulled the bus the quickest, in two legs, Lambda Chi Alpha fraternity pulled it 25 feet in a combined time of 13.43 seconds and were the winners of the all-male division. Elon Cheerleading won in the co-ed division with a combined time of 14.71 seconds.

Health costs next on agenda

Bill's passage could end up being merely the opening salvo

WASHINGTON — What's it going to cost me?

That's the single biggest unanswered question about President Barack Obama's new health care overhaul law — and its weak spot.

Many experts believe the law falls short on taming costs, and that will force Congress to revisit health care in a few years.

While it seems hard to believe now, Republicans might want to participate in a debate over costs, perhaps opening the way for limits on malpractice lawsuits and other ideas they've advocated.

"Now that the baseline question of coverage has been answered, it would be irresponsible if we didn't come back and try to do more on costs," said Sen. Mark Warner, D-Va., who voted for the bill and led efforts to squeeze more savings.

"I think there is going to be a debate in the Republican Party on whether they should waste all their energy on repeal or make an effort to do something on cost containment," Warner said.

For now, the political parties are too polarized — and lawmakers too exhausted — to contemplate health care 2.0. Conservatives are planning court challenges, and some Republican leaders hold out the promise of repeal. But economic reality probably will bring lawmakers back to the table.

Insurance premiums are likely to keep going up over the next few years. Experts predict that the law's early benefits — such as expanded coverage for children and young adults — could nudge rates a little higher than would otherwise have been the case. Also, insurers and medical providers could try to raise their prices ahead of big shifts set for 2014.

Under the 10-year, $1 trillion plan, 2014 is when competitive insurance markets for individuals and small businesses are expected to open, and tax credits start flowing to help millions of middle-class households now uninsured. Medicaid will expand and pick up millions of low-income people. Most Americans would be required to carry health

For local woman, grief fueled artistic outpouring

Judith Madarasz turned to painting after her mother's sudden death

WHITSETT — When Judith Madarasz looks at a flower or a sunset or even into someone's eyes, she sees something different than she once did.

"It gets my imagination going," she says. "I get into such a beautiful state of mind. I feel like I'm in heaven."

She then must reach for a sketchbook or paint brush.

Such sights compel her to translate what is in her mind's eye to paper or canvas. Whether it is through vibrant watercolors or acrylic paints, she breathes life into landscapes, portraits and cityscapes.

"This outlet for me is so natural," Madarasz said. "... I never know what I'm going to paint next."

It's a statement that is perhaps true for many artists: The inspiration for their work is unpredictable and surprising. But for Madarasz, her art, talent — gift — is still fresh and new and shrouded in the kind of mystery that leaves those who have seen it wondering where it all came from.

She, too, seems as if she is still smitten with it all — a woman on a honeymoon with her craft.

Madarasz, a native of Budapest, Hungary, didn't grow up surrounded by paint and brushes. She didn't doodle or dabble in the arts. She lived what she described as a "simple" life in a country riddled with troubles. The communist regime that took over after World War II meant that her own family's history — her maternal grandfather's noble
